Golden Gate Law News Tips

Environmental Law Clinic and Clients Celebrate Decision to Close Power Plant

For the past 12 years, Golden Gate Law students and faculty have represented several community and environmental groups working to close the Hunter's Point power plant in San Francisco. Now, their work is coming to fruition. Last month state regulators approved plans to shut down the plant as early as April 2006. The Hunter's Point and nearby Potrero power plants are the largest stationary sources of air pollution in San Francisco and have been blamed for aggravating medical conditions among nearby residents and for harming marine life in San Francisco Bay. As part of the clinic's efforts to close the Hunter's Point plant, Golden Gate student clinicians prepared witnesses, pleadings, and briefs and engaged in engaging in administrative proceedings, court litigation and negotiations, while client groups worked with governmental agencies to develop a new, more sustainable approach to energy reliability.

The ELJC has another reason to celebrate: In March the California Energy Commission terminated Mirant Corporation's proposal to expand its Potrero power plant. The existing Mirant plant is scheduled to lose its state contract for electricity in 2007, when a new City-owned power plant with state-of-the-art pollutions controls is scheduled to begin operation. The decision not to permit expansion of the Mirant Potrero facility, together with the loss of the state contract, means the entire facility may close next year. Contact Alan Ramo at (415) 442-6654 or aramo@ggu.edu.

Golden Gate Law Students Help New Orleans Residents With Legal Problems Following Hurricane Katrina

In March six Golden Gate University School of Law traveled to New Orleans, with funding from the School of Law, to help local residents with legal issues. The students resided at the Common Ground Collective Headquarters in the city's Upper Ninth Ward and were among several hundred college students, including some law students (most from the San Francisco Bay Area), who came to help out at Common Ground over spring break. "I spent most of the week at Common Ground's community, media and legal center," says third-year law student Christopher Swanson, "where one room was converted into a legal resource center, including two attorneys volunteering full-time. "Though the size of the legal center was small, the legal issues they were working on were huge in significance. One issue of great importance was the fact that the city was planning to demolish 2,500 houses based on arbitrary assessments of their habitability. I drafted a memo laying out procedural due process and 'takings' clause arguments that may be used in defense of these homeowners." Contact Christopher Swanson at 650-740-5576 or swanyboy@msn.com.

Moot Court Helps Practicing Lawyers
Prepare Their Oral Arguments

The School of Law and its Appellate Advocacy Institute is hosting a series of Moot Courts for Practicing Lawyers to help attorneys argue their cases in appellate court. Established by Professor Myron Moskowitz, director of the institute, the program serves the legal profession and the judiciary—along with GGU students, who have the rare opportunity to observe real lawyers arguing real courses right on campus. Participating attorneys can receive one hour of MCLE credit for participating in the program. At the end of the argument, the "judges" give them feedback and suggestions that can increase their chance of success in their real argument. Participating attorneys have argued for appellants ranging from the San Francisco Firefighters Local 798 to an inmate on death row. "To my knowledge, there is nothing like this program in the country," Moskowitz says. Contact Myron Moskowitz at 415-442-6646 or mmoskovitz@ggu.edu.
